THE SUMMIT OF MT. WASHBURN is 10,340 feet above sea-level, 2552 feet above Yellowstone Lake, and 5,000 above the bottom of the Great Canon; it affords one of the best views of all the Park, as it lies a little north-east of the center. The view shown in ethis picture looks south affording a glimpse of the Grand Canon in the near foreground. Pack mules are the only vehicles for the transportation of the necessaries of life sufficient for a satisfactory visit to the vast National Park, as there are scores of points one wants to visit where no wheels ever have been. Many stops for camping must be made, as the tourist, hungry, weary and sore with the continuous change of elevation, scene and temperature, is reminded that humanity must stop betimes to recuperate. No one should think of visiting this Reservation of wonderland's curiosities without taking at least a weeks' time. The area of the Park is 300 square miles, nearly every one of which is full of interest for the visitor. The entire region must once have been volcanic, as the many geysers, still boiling, strongly attest.
